En Egypte.

Les Anglais ont toujours pour légitimer leurs prétentions, les mots de civilisation, de bienfaits, etc., etc.

On ne sait trop quels bienfaits l'occupation anglaise aura apporté à l'Egypte ; mais il en est un qu'on ne pourra pas, semble-t-il, lui contester, c'est l'importation de la rage.

L'Egypte passait, en effet, jusqu'à ces temps derniers, pour un pays où la rage était inconnue ; et les chiens errants, qui sont aussi nombreux au Caire qu'à Constantinople, étaient avec raison considérés comme inoffensifs.

Or, en 1886, un terrier, appartenant à un soldat anglais, devint euragé. Depuis lors, chaque année, on signala en Egypte quelques cas de rage, soit chez l'homme, soit chez le chien ; si bien que dans ces dix dernières années le nombre des cas de rage a été se multipliant, et qu'on en a enregistré trente-six chez le chien, trois chez le cheval, deux chez le mulet et soixante chez l'homme, ceux-ci d'ailleurs toujours mortels.
